

Westminster's global popularity comes at a cost—overcrowding is a constant issue, particularly around major attractions. The high density of tourists often results in inflated prices, making it less affordable for residents. Housing is expensive and frequently caters to wealthy investors rather than families. Pollution levels are a concern due to heavy traffic, particularly around Oxford Street. Despite its grandeur, the area can feel impersonal, with locals overshadowed by transient visitors. Westminster's nightlife hubs, like Soho, can sometimes lead to noise complaints and antisocial behavior. For some, the borough's polished façade lacks the warmth and authenticity found elsewhere in London.
